discontinuance of the Fast Mail Service seems to be generally acquiesced in, even in those cities which derived benefit therefrom, if there ever was any benefit in it. Facts, however, have demonstrated that the service was of no real sit in it. Facts, however, have demonstrated that the service was of no real benefit to the business interests of the country; that it was expensive beyond all comparison with its advantages; that it was not even advantageous to the New York journals in whose interest the system was originated. Neither their subscription lists nor the transient sale of their papers was increased by it.

In refusing an appropriation to continue this expensive luxury, Congress did a praiseworthy act—that is it would have been such had the motives been other than to manufacture political capital. That such was the motive, irrespective of true economic considerations, is evident from the fact that in the insane partizanism which permeates every act of the lower House of Congress, a matter of much more serious import threatens not only the journalistic but the commercial interests of the country as a result of the niggardly policy of the Democratic Congress in the Postoffice appropriation.

This, according to the Railroad Age, is the probable refusal of the Eastern railroads to carry the through postal cars at their present rate of compensation. This would make a decided difference in the time of transmission and delivery of business correspondence. So long as the postal cars are run, the mails are held open in New York to the last moment moved from Ohio to Monros, Michigan, where they now reside, and after one of his campaigns in Virgimia the boy-gener-al went home on a furlough. He was fresh from some of his raids, and he had The American Manufacturer has a somewhat interesting article showing the rapid decline of the English wrought iron trade, particularly in the item of rails. The condition of things which has culminated in the almost utter ruin of the English rail trade seems to be no late thing, to be accounted for her than smiled upon the gallant young dark already captured more flags and prison thing, to be accounted for by the panicky state of trade in all manufacture more attracted by her than all the color of the panicky state of trade in all manufacture more attracted by her than all the color of the panicky state of trade in all manufacture. thing, to be accounted for by the panicky state of trade in all manufacturing departments during the last three yoars. The depression is not one that may be reasonably expected to be relieved by a general revival of trade. The cause of decadence would seem to be famoured deep seated than that generally assigned for the depression in other lines of manufacture. In reviewing the history of the trade in England, the conclusion is reached that there is too much reason to warrant the statement that the finished iron trade has long been in a decaying state.

It is a condition which can be largely accounted for in the steady and aure advancement of the rail industry of the servers of t vancement of the rail industry of the United States, heretofore one of the largest and most profitable customers of English manufacturer. The same "The INTELLIGENCER not unfrequently prints extracts from the National, making kindly comments thereon. Upon the rail trade in particular, the Manufacturer gives the views of an eminent English contemporary, to the effect that since the summer of 1874 until the present, the rail trade has steadily retrograded until now but one-half of the puddling furnaces in the north the puddling furnaces in the north fairly arrived at that dismal destination, In Wales and Scotland rail makers have been much better off. Both Wales and Scotland have made frantic efforts to wrest from Cleveland the few orders tha came into market, and the result, of this sharp competition is now seen in the shapended animation and partial or complete insolvency of a large number of firms, one company having made a loss on last year's work of £165,000; this, by courting trade and carrying on operations at ruinous rates, and further, that the last returns issued by the Board of Arbitration for the north of England iron trade showed that in Cleveland the production of rails had fallen from 60,000 and 70,-

Its remedial cancilies are, however 000 tons to a little over 20,000 tons pe quarter.

The decadence of the rall trade of Cleveland and Wales may be regarded as a matter beyond all controversy. It is, however, more difficult to estimate the probable duration of this decay—whether it is merely temporary and due to transient causes, or whether it is 50 far permanent that recuperation may norshortly be expected. It is generally admitted that the decay of the rail trade is due (1) to the substitution of steel for iron rails; (2) to the development of the rail-producing quarter. hey are weak and inactive. In fact, there i to the development of the rail-producing resources of other countries heretoforedependent upon England; (3) to the too rapid and extensive expansion of our means of supply; and (4) to the deglution and repletion of railway enterprise in Europe and America. So far as the employment of steel in lieu of Iron rails is concerned, there is a universal concensus of opinion and experience in favor of the former and the use of steel in the future is only likely to be limited by the resources for its production. Costing ab initio no more than 30s. to 40s, per ton more than iron, steel rails of good quality are found to wear from two to five times as long. They may not be worth so much relatively when they are done, but even this is only a temporary difficulty, inasmuch as new uses and naw processes of utilization are every now and again coming into vogue. The development of the rail-producing resources of other countries is a difficulty of a much more grave and forbidding kind. America has now capabilities for the manufacture of steel which greatly outweigh those of Great Britain, and it is a notable fact that on the other side of the Atlantic the manufacture of Bessemer steel in particular seaseled a decree of intraction that to the development of the rail-producing resources of other countries heretofore denot be used with advantage.
